The keeper climbed the stair each evening with the same slow care, counting the steps under his breath as his father had done before him.

Below the tower the sea worked at the rocks without rest, and the gulls rode the wind as if it had been built for them alone.

He trimmed the wick, wiped the glass, and set the great lamp turning, so that its beam swept out across the water and back again.

The keeper climbed the stair each evening with the same slow care, counting the steps under his breath as his father had done before him.

Below the tower the sea worked at the rocks without rest, and the gulls rode the wind as if it had been built for them alone.

He trimmed the wick, wiped the glass, and set the great lamp turning, so that its beam swept out across the water and back again.